co-operation between them.

You have in your young age come to this country. I wish you will have a pleasant time here, and will return with nice recollections of old Norway and her people and with the feeling that you have visited a kindred race. And I do hope that that feeling will last for life, and that you will as men do your share to strengthen the good relations between your great people and ours as well as all other peoples, and thus help to create a solid foundation for really wholesome international relations and for a betterment of the world.

I once more thank you from all my heart for your great gift and for your coming here and for all the kind sympathy and interest you have shown me.

Believe me, my dear friends, your grateful friend,

Fridtjof Nansen,
